

TWO SMALL FARES OF FRESH FISH

Hub Dragger Goes Aground.

Lying at the beach at Long Island midway between the government wharf and the city pier, the Boston auxiliary dragger Catherine Graffeo is listed sharply to starboard, her hold full of water, after striking early yesterday morning in thick fog, while outward bound to the fishing grounds. Capt. Gough and his crew of seven men stepped ashore without difficulty, and after it became evident that the vessel could not be floated, without being pumped out and righted, all hands went to Boston.

SCH. FALLON TOTAL LOSS ON PLUM ISLAND

Abandoned by her captain and crew, the local schooner, John J. Fallon, Capt. Manuel Roderick, is a total loss on the southeast end of Plum Island, where she was driven during the heavy fog shortly after midnight, Wednesday evening. All efforts to pull her off by cutters yesterday afternoon failed and Capt. Roderick, his crew of 18 and the dories were brought to port by patrol boats from Base 7.

The Fallon, one of the local haddockers, hit on the rocks at the tip of the island, called Emerson rocks. She is the first vessel to be wrecked on the island for many years.

The craft was bound home from the eastward with about 35,000 pounds of fish, and in the heavy mist, the watch failed to pick up Thacher's lights and continued off his course until the craft hit the rocks. The vessel quickly filled with water and sunk so that at high tide yesterday, only the tops of the spars showed above the surface.

Built in 1908.

The Fallon was built at Essex in 1908, and was 103 feet long, with a beam of 24 feet. She was equipped with auxiliary power, and was one of the prettiest modeled craft sailing out of Gloucester. She was owned by the Gorton-Pew Vessels Company.
